

The meeting movement is a new way of working, one that's centered on well-being, social interaction, and distributed creativity.

Social interactions

Social interaction in the new way of working is about fostering engagement from everywhere we work. When we assess where and how we are all working these days, we need to factor in every social interaction and experience we face across all kinds of spaces, from open and closed spaces to everything in between.

Spontaneous

Social interaction happens when we all come together to meet, and it's not just the scheduled meetings but also those spontaneous interactions around the water cooler, in the kitchen or even grabbing a coffee while quickly exchanging ideas.
